Super Moon Has Nothing on Your Super A

Last night, I took my kids out to see the Super Moon and it WAS super because it was the moon, but I could not really tell if it was any closer to the Earth nor if poets were more especially busy with their work nor if werewolves felt a distinct awesome feeling in their collective fur.* However, I did know that to mark the coming of the Super Moon (or, to be more exact, to give students a place to hammer out those papers), the library started being open for 24 hours. So, please come study with us during finals! Unlike that guy on the Internet who went into the Waffle House to find the employees sleeping, you will not find us a-slamber, so we will gladly check out books, laptops, iPads, cameras, or Kindles to you without you having to do it for yourself! Plus, it will feel super when you get a good grade. Bright and shining as the moon, friendz.

They have a collective fur because furs, plural, sounded weird to me. And why can’t they?? It’s just like you and I have a collective love for pizza and kittens and Otis Redding.

If you are a werewolf yourself, please feel free to weigh in re: your Jungian ways.

NYTimes Best Books of 2017

Everyone is beginning to come up with their end-of-year lists of highlights. My personal reel includes going to New York, driving through the heartland to Chicago, getting a new-to-me car with a stick shift, and eating that sausage dog at the fair. Here is the NYTimes top list of books for 2017. Remember if we don’t have them (yet!), you may request them from Interlibrary Loan or on our Kindles. Happy Holidays, Argos. We hope you have a great, highlight-making break, full of the things you love.

1. Autumn by Ali Smith
2. Exit West by Mohsin Hamid
3. Pachinko by Min Jin Lee
4. The Power by Naomi Alderman
5. Sing, Unburied, Sing by Jesmyn Ward
7. Grant by Ron Chernow
9. Prairie Fires: The American Dreams of Laura Ingalls Wilder by Caroline Fraser
10. Priestdaddy by Patricia Lockwood
